Knowledge is power; but most knowledge is tied up in text. So how do the 774 million illiterate adults in the world access knowledge crucial to preventing disease, creating economic opportunity, and defending their political and human rights?

Last summer Cliff spent six weeks in a remote region of Ghana to understand rural poverty and sustainable development. He saw many impressive local organizations sharing valuable information for development; but he also experienced the inefficiency of delivering all this information in person.

Join Cliff, as he shares his observations from Ghana and discusses Literacy Bridge's Talking Book Project, which is developing a new and affordable digital audio technology to deliver vital, locally generated information and literacy training to children and adults with limited access to either.
